Natural Gas Week features TU's Energy Management program

TU's Energy Management program was recognized in Natural Gas Week on January 3 in an article about the increasing complexity of energy education.

The article detailed how the program came to be at TU, and how it is developing graduates with a high success rate of job placement, said Energy Management Program Director Ted Jacobs.

"To have a successful program like this, you need certain things: a petroleum engineering program, a law school, be located in an oil-patch city and have access to excellent industry people who can come to the classroom," Jacobs was quoted as saying to Natural Gas Week. "The University of Tulsa has all that. There is no reason why TU can't become the energy education capital of the world. We have everything right here to accomplish that."

Jacobs said Natural Gas Week is like the Wall Street Journal of the energy industry. So it is great recognition of the program.

In addition, Jacobs noted that students are also able to earn a minor in energy, which can take them far when paired with a major such as accounting. An energized accountant would have the ability to work in a business environment and use their knowledge of energy and the industry, enabling them to accomplish a broader range of work.

Along with increasing the focus on energy management education, the school is developing a plan for a new online master of energy program in partnership with Robert Gordon University in Aberdeen, Scotland. The master's program will be catered toward those energy professionals already in the field, needing to further their knowledge in certain fields in a distance learning system without leaving the industry.
